2. citations and explanations (Rule 70.7)

Claim 1-5 and 8 lack novelty under PCT Article 33(2) as being anticipated by Wolrich et al. (5,627,773).

Wolrich et al discloses, for example in figures 3 and 4 the same floating point arithmetic circuit for converting numbers between an integer format and a floating point format as claimed (see abstract). It is noted that the longest floating point is represented in double precision having a longest mantissa of 52 bit, thus only requires 52-bit data path for floating point arithmetic. However, Wolrich et al. teaches the circuit having 64-bit data path including shift register and rounding circuit for enabling the conversion between a floating point and a quad word integer. The additional bits in registers of the data path beyond the required 52-bit for floating point arithmetic can be seen as the additional register position to accommodate a shift beyond the data path required by an arithmetic operation as claimed.

Claims 6,7 and 9-16 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2)-(4), because the prior art does not teach or fairly suggest a conversion between a floating point format and an integer format using a floating point arithmetic circuit by determining whether a shift operation required to align a floating point for integer representation will cause bits to be shifted beyond the extreme rightmost bit of the floating point number, and using a second conversion constant to determine a number of bit positions to shift if the shift operation will cause bits to be shifted beyond the extreme rightmost bit, otherwise, using a first conversion constant to determine a number of bit positions to shift.
